Tiger Creek Preserve

Part of Florida's Ancient Islands

The Nature Conservancy is the world's leading private conservation organization. Since 1951 we've worked with communities, businesses and people like you to protect more than 119 million acres worldwide.

In 1971, The Nature Conservancy joined with the local community to protect Tiger Creek and its surrounding uplands. Today, The Nature Conservancy owns and manages the 5,000-acre Tiger Creek Preserve.

Natural Features

Tiger Creek is a high-quality blackwater seepage stream—so called because it drains wetlands, and the vegetation that falls into the creek colors the water. There are only two or three high-quality streams like it remaining on the Lake Wales Ridge. The preserve protects various Florida habitat—hardwood swamps and hammocks, scrubby—and pine—flatwoods and sandhills—and rare animals and plants including swallow-tail kites, bald eagles, gopher tortoises, Lewton's polygala and Carter's mustard.

Tips for Navigating Trails

- ◆ Look for blazes! Always look ahead for the next paint blaze. If you don't see a blaze soon, retrace your steps until you find the last one.
- ◆ Each trail is blazed with a different color paint. Refer to the color guide on the map.
- ◆ The trails may change directly abruptly. Notice double blazes! They indicate that the trail changes direction. Pay Attention!
- ◆ Don't try to navigate your way on the Preserve service roads. (They rarely go where you think they should.)
- ◆ If you get lost, call 863-443-0630.
- ◆ During the rainy season, parts of trails may be under water.
